United States policy goals have long advanced efficiency and equity concerns. Of late, however, resilience as a policy goal is receiving increased attention. In the cybersecurity arena, for example, we are evaluating our systems and institutions for resiliency—asking whether we are prepared to adapt and cope with cyberharms. Recent events including electric power market shocks in Texas, wildfires (and forest health concerns), cyber-attacks on infrastructure, and water management issues in the wake of droughts, resilience is a concept whose time has come. In this panel, we will address this overall concept and pay particular attention to its application in the cybersecurity context.
