Climate Change and Food Security

On Monday, October 8, 2007, I traveled to New York, NY to participate in a program organized by the Humpty Dumpty Institute. This program consisted of a series of briefings for Congressional staff at the United Nations. The delegation, comprised of senior Congressional and Senate advisors, attended briefings on the theme of Climate Change and Food Security.

The trip encouraged information sharing between the various delegations to the U.N. and the U.N. programs themselves and Congress, and informed participants of the effects of climate change on developing countries. In addition, the speakers briefed the delegation on the role their organizations play in addressing these challenges.

On Monday night, the delegation met with members of several countries’ diplomatic missions to the U.N. and well as full-time staff of the U.N.

On Tuesday, October 9, 2007, the delegation attended briefings at the U.S. Mission to the U.N. The delegation met with members of the Mission, including Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, and received an overview of U.S. policy priorities at the U.N.

The delegation also met with Deborah Saidy, Director of the New York Liaison office of the U.N. World Food Program. Ms. Saidy emphasized WFP’s efforts to diminish the effects of natural disasters on food resources. Additionally, Ms. Saidy discussed WFP efforts supporting reforestation, land rehabilitation and restoring Ethiopia’s vegetation cover.

Next, the delegation met with Robert Patterson, Senior Liaison Officer of the Food and Agricultural Organization. Mr. Patterson discussed, among other issues, the Growing Connection, a grassroots project that connects youths in America and developing countries while fostering a passion for agriculture.

The delegation then met with the Ethiopian Ambassador to the UN, Dawit Yohannes. Ambassador Yohannes discussed the effects of climate change in his home country, in particular, how farmers are challenged by changing precipitation patterns and deforestation. Ambassador Yohannes also discussed how Ethiopia is combating the effects of climate change through reforestation.

Finally, the delegation met with Ms. Juanita Castaño, Director of the United Nations Environmental Program. She informed the delegation of UNEP’s role in setting environmental guidelines for other U.N. programs seeking to foster sustainable development in emerging nations.
