Additionally, I had a chance to engage with local elected officials to discuss the importance of agriculture to the local economy and hear from them on the burdensome regulations that could be potentially harmful to their community.

When touring the sugarcane fields, we learned and saw first-hand the best management practices they apply in this part of the world and how it differs from other areas such as Texas and Louisiana. We heard more from the producers about the need to have access to equipment that does not have emissions equipment. Additionally, we saw how they manage their water through a series of canals and pumps. It was also interesting to see the mill and how it operates and how it is environmentally and economically efficient.

Following this, we had a good discussion with a citrus producer who talked to us about the issues arising from citrus greening and Canker, but also the trade issues that are continuing to batter the industry.

Closing out this day, we got to speak with local producers and cattlemen about the issues they were facing with trade, labor, water quality, etc.

On the last full day, I was able to see a few different forms of agriculture, from large scale celery production farm to a small scale local agro-tourism facility where we talked with local producers about the labor, trade, environmental issues they are facing and what can be done to improve conditions for them.
