Question 4

We are inviting the following staff to participate in trip to National Lab of the Rockies it will be an opportunity to observe firsthand the strategic push for domestic energy independence, critical minerals extraction, and solar energy development. In addition to understanding about supply chains and how the U.S. is "just-shoring" resource supply chains, extracting critical materials for electric vehicles, and addressing the geopolitical realities of clean-tech manufacturing. These staff members were selected based on their interest in climate and energy issues and because these topics are part of their legislative portfolios. The visit will allow them to engage directly with researchers and subject-matter experts and see firsthand how NREL's work is advancing clean energy technologies, enhancing U.S. energy security, strengthening domestic manufacturing and supply chains, and supporting American economic competitiveness. By connecting research with real-world applications, the visit will provide valuable context that can inform future legislative and policy discussions.
